

Student's Name

Teacher's Name

Course

Date

A Selected Annotated Bibliography on Privacy and Technology

→ Alderman, Ellen, and Caroline Kennedy. Right to Privacy. New York: Vintage, 2004. Print.

These lines list the sources' bibliography info. in MLA format.

The authors of this informative national bestseller, who have experienced privacy violations of their own, make the claim that since there is no comprehensive agenda to solve the problem of informational privacy, American citizens will have to be concerned about protecting their personal information. One reason the authors give to support their claim is that most of citizens' personal information is already being stored on computers that may not be well protected. For instance, as Alderman and Kennedy point out, most bank, insurance, medical and pharmaceutical records are stored on computers others may be able to access. A good example the authors provide of such ease of access is an incident in which a reporter was able to get Dan Quayle's credit report with a phone call, fifty dollars, and a home computer.

This part of the sentence describes the authors, their purpose &

A summary of the book is offered here.

This sentence describes the useful part of the source.

→ Furger, Roberta. "Washington Tackles Internet Law." PC World. PC World, 1 Sept. 2007. Web.

9 Dec. 2007. Internet expert and best-selling author, Roberta Furger informs the general public of the many Internet related bills that congress is considering. Furger claims that a more comprehensive law to govern the collecting of sharing on the Internet is needed that meets the needs of both privacy advocates and internet service providers. Furger supports this claim by detailing the ways that proposed bills fail to adequately meet the needs of either of these two groups. The article offers a useful listing of bills that are currently before congress.

This part of the sentence describes the author, purpose, & audience.

A summary is offered here.

This sentence describes what is useful in the article.

SCHOOL OF LIBERAL ARTS
INDIANA UNIVERSITY
University Writing Center
IUPUI